Democrats Need a Net of Two Seats to Win Control of Senate

If there's a 50/50 split, as there was in early 2001, the vice president would break the tie, so control determined by the party in the White House

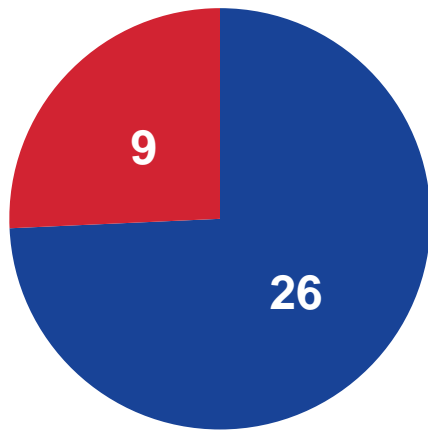

Note: Independents, shown in yellow, caucus with the Democrats and are included in the Democratic tally.

Democrats Are Defending Far More Seats

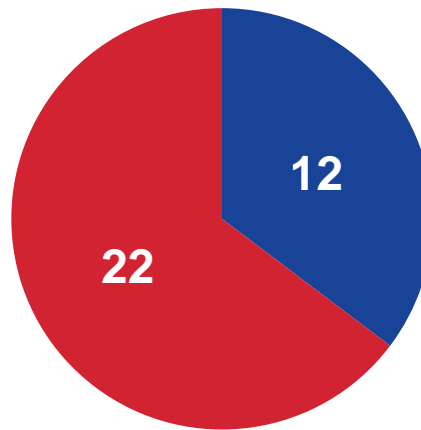

Two special elections in 2018 after Al Franken (D-Minn.) and Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) resigned

Senate Seats up for Election

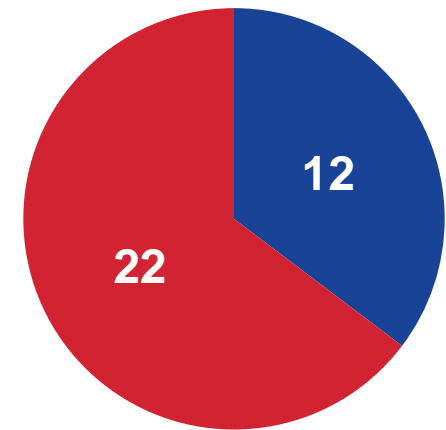

● Now held by Republicans ● Now held by Democrats

2018

2022

Notes: There are 103 seats shown in the three graphics because of three special elections – two in 2018 and one in 2020. The winners of the Nov. 6 special elections in Minnesota and Mississippi will finish the six-year terms won by Franken and Cochran in 2014, and be up for re-election in 2020. The 2020 graphic includes a special election for the Arizona seat formerly held by John McCain (R), who died in August. McCain's successor, Sen. Jon Kyl (R), won't run in the special election. The winner of that election will be up for re-election in 2022. Independent Sens. Bernie Sanders of Vermont and Angus King of Maine are running for re-election in 2018 and caucus with the Democrats; they are shown in blue.

Key House Races

Republicans control 240 seats compared with 195 for Democrats when vacant districts are assigned to the parties that most recently held them

- Democrats need a net gain of 23 seats for a majority of 218
- There are 25 Republican-held districts that Hillary Clinton won in the 2016 election and 12 Democratic-held districts that Donald Trump carried

In midterm elections since World War II, the average result has been a net loss of 26 House seats for the White House's party

- Democratic advantages: Midterm election history, President Donald Trump's subpar approval rating, candidate recruitment and fundraising
- Republican advantages: Battle-tested incumbents, redistricting, demographic sorting patterns, outside money

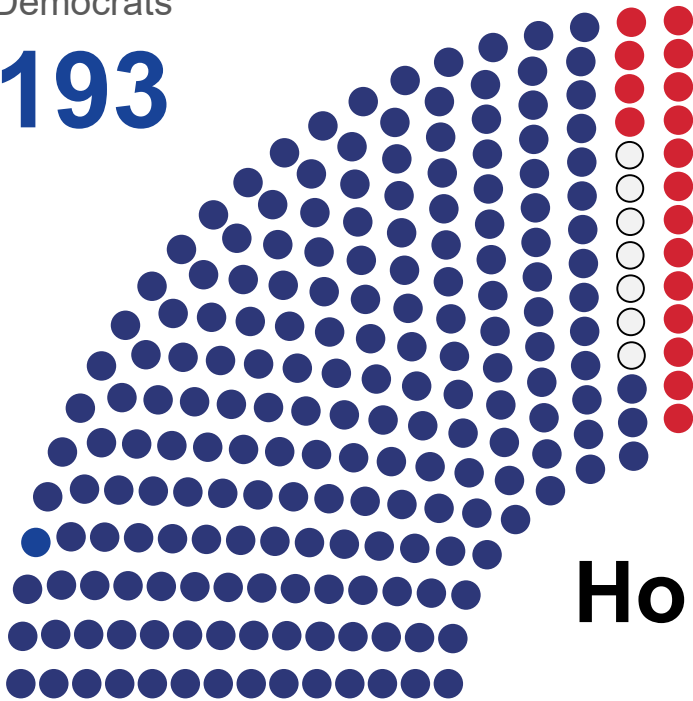

This slide deck provides an overview of:

- Current House balance of power
- How the White House's party has fared in past House midterm elections
- Profiles of 80 House races worth watching
